Admissions Policy (Policies for Admission to the University)

General Entrance Examinations for both the master's and doctoral programs are held twice a year, with the first round in July and the second round in February or March. In recognition of the range of university graduation periods in Japan and overseas, persons applying to the first-round entrance examinations may choose whether to enroll in September or in April of the following year. Note also that those applying to the second-round entrance examinations may choose whether to enroll in April or in September of the year concerned.

In order to ensure that the education at Graduate School of Economics is broadly available to students whose first language is not Japanese, applicant may choose to take examinations for both the master's and doctoral programs wholly in English. A written examination (field examination) and interview serve to determine a basic knowledge of economics and facility to read academic papers to an undergraduate level for the first-round entrance examinations for the master's program. Furthermore, enrollment precluding the necessity of a written examination may be permitted for the second-round entrance examinations for students who demonstrated high potential as researchers during their bachelor's thesis research. In such cases, examinations will be by means of an evaluation of the papers submitted with applications and an interview.

For the entrance examinations for admission to the doctoral program, peer review of submitted papers and an interview will be conducted to examine the broad and foundational knowledge, degree of expertise, and facility to conduct research in a specialized field of economics. We actively encourage applications from persons who completed a master's degree program at universities other than Keio.
